Also it states that checks once created, but uncashed, remain on the network until cashed...could a flood of check creations without intent to cash them cause network congestion ?

When considering attacks that new features might allow, it's often helpful to compare the new attack the worst existing attack and if it's worse, then you should worry. If not, then you don't need to worry. 1/2

The worst analogous attack would be someone creating lots and lots of different versions of a particular document, each with a different rate and checks aren't. Since that is acceptable, checks don't create any new risk from creating lots of them. 2/2

Any change to a public ledger system has costs associated with it to everyone who uses that system. At an absolute minimum, they have to ensure the change doesn't break any behavior that they're relying on. So the bar for accepting a change should be pretty high. 1/2

We haven't seen all that much demand for this feature. So we never were quite convinced the benefits exceeded that basic "cost of any change in behavior". But others could certainly disagree. If we opposed it for any significant reason, we'd certainly say so! 2/2
